My attempt is: func foo(_ bar: Any) -> Any { if bar is Foo { return true as Any } return false as Any } which doesn't compile. I'd like to avoid a if let or guard in this case. This question is, I think, linked to this one: How to check if destination is defined? A: Although the process of understanding how to do this seems straightforward, there's a catch: Swift is a strict static language, not dynamically-typed, so there's no opportunity to invoke a function and see what kind of result it returns. The basic idea is that you don't have functions. You have functions that take things as parameters and return things. You don't have functions that return things. Moreover, functions are the primary representation of values in Swift, and all functions are only ever created once. If you define a function, you can't replace it with a different function. If you want to check whether a function will return a destination, the solution is to examine its implementation. The implementation of any function consists of nothing but the function definition and the actual logic that the function contains. This logic doesn't contain any references to the variables it acts on, nor does it contain any references to the return values it returns. Therefore, by examining the implementation of a function, you can determine whether or not the function will return a destination. A function that returns a destination type may do one of the following: Return the destination directly. Make a copy of the destination. Throw
