how to improve your Java development process, meet your next co-worker or gain new friends! Every developer had to deal with an error that he or she couldn't find the solution. We all have those moments in life when we run into an error and get stuck. Our brains start churning and we aren't sure what to do next. We always look for a clue, a solution. Hopefully, this problem can be solved. It's such a shame that so much engineering effort goes into creating a good program only to find that it doesn't work properly when you need it to. Sure, you can turn to the manual, but not everything is described there. As a software developer, you should be skilled in the application of programming or software development in order to make your projects succeed. Whether they are big or small, they should all succeed, otherwise you have nothing to show for your efforts. This problem can be avoided and you can avoid it by setting up a process that will allow you to run a build successfully every time. What if you could use a system that lets you test your code the way it should be. Many of us are relatively inexperienced in terms of how best to do this and others are already doing it, but those people do it best. They are able to avoid wasting time chasing their tails and they enjoy their work more. It's extremely frustrating to open your project, find a bunch of errors, fix it and then find another one. We can't pick up our tools and start coding again.

We can't just close the project without fixing everything.Q:

How to use Solr via index.php?

I have a website which uses PHP to build a HTML form and POST it to my index.php in a directory. Then I extract the POST data and get the data I want for query purposes in my index.php. I am using: $site =

"". $_SERVER['SERVER_NAME']. $_SERVER['REQUEST_URI']; $url = "". $_SERVER['SERVER_NAME']. ":". $_SERVER['SERVER_PORT']. $site;
