The basis of the development of the bone stress syndrome is the deficit of bone material which appears to have been loaded into the growth. The syndrome may be seen in sportsmen, and all types of work that require a force load on a bone. The manifestation of the syndrome includes pain, an increased mobility of the bone, and crepitus. In many cases, the syndrome disappears spontaneously after the bone is recovered and its mobility decreased. If the condition remains, however, it may cause the development of fibro-osseous conditions, deformations of long bones, and bone cancers. As part of a Chicago forum for leaders from around the world to explore shared global challenges, U.S. Deputy Defense Secretary Robert Work and Admiral John Richardson discussed ways to enhance the security of American troops in the Middle East. "The heart of America's military strategy today is regional security, not the dismantling of regional security," said Richardson, who also serves as a member of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff. "The fact that we're having this exchange is critical to making sure that the Defense Department is informed by our allies, and is planning how to best leverage our security relationship with our allies, while continuing to build with them that military relationship." Advancing regional security through a more effective and efficient multilateral approach is a key component of the "Obama Doctrine" as outlined by President Barack Obama. Obama's strategy aims to promote regional security and the stability of the Middle East region by strengthening partnerships and effectively leveraging American influence. "Under [Secretary of Defense Jim] Mattis, we're going to continue to reaffirm our commitment to the region," said Deputy Defense Secretary Work. "All of this is being done in concert with our partners." In the Middle East, America seeks to partner with countries that share a common interest in stability. This includes Saudi Arabia, whose energy security is critical to the United States, and where the military partnership will continue to grow. The U.S. does not seek to replace the Saudi military with a U.S. military force. "There's no interest in taking on a role that was not already agreed to by others," said Richardson. "The question of providing active military force is only for the host-nation." The U.S.
